

Rulers of India: Sir Thomas Munro and the British Settlement of the Madras Presidency (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Rulers of India: Sir Thomas Munro and the British Settlement of the Madras Presidency No name, in any part of India, perhaps, is so familiar or held in such veneration as that of Munro is in the Madras Presidency, though two generations have passed away since his death. In the town of Madras the celebrated equestrian statue by Chantrey serves as a landmark, ever keeping the name of Munro in the mouths of all; but in the Districts where the best years of his life were spent no monument is needed to perpetuate his name or memory. Great changes have taken place in Southern India during the two-thirds of a century since Munros death. The country has been opened up by railways and telegraph wires, and the people have been modernized by schools and colleges. Almost every town which Munro visited as Collector, Colonel, and Governor has now a railway station or is within a few hours drive of one, and each has its English school, its dispensary or hospital, its post and telegraph office, its magistrates court and its police station.
