Excerpt: ...as Fred carried out a warm pan of milk to feed it, no doubt that all three were glad that the sound of a gun had not ended that homelike plaintive cry of the little red calf. Cousin Edytha EXCURSIONS IN DICTIONARY-LAND III A horse! a horse! my kingdom for a horse.--Shakespeare N last months excursion it was said that the gale at the end of nightingale has nothing to do with the wind. But though not derived from gale, meaning wind, it certainly is related: because it comes from the old root gat, which signifies singing or making some kind of a noise. We have all heard the wind moaning and whistling around the chimney-pots; and when it blows so strongly as to sing, it is called a gale. We have so little to do with zebras that one word suffices to describe the males, the females, and their young, whereas horses have been friends with us for so long that we have invented a great many names for them. We call fathers and mothers of horses stallions and mares; young horses are known as colts or foals, while their sisters are called fillies. We have, in fact, at least eighteen different names for the horse, and the number might easily be doubled by a little search. Here are some of them: palfrey steed, nag, charger, hobby-horse, tat, mount, courser, hack, destrier, hunter, stallion, pad, roadster, and cob. Palfrey has been shortened from paraveredus, a Latin word which meant an extra couriers horse or post-horse, but later on it was used to describe a horse suited for a lady to ride. A steed is a spirited horse, and comes from an old English word stod, a collection of horses for racing or other purposes. We still speak of a stud of race-horses, and horse-fanciers always keep a stud-book
