

The Rabbit Trap

Reading, Writing and Rehab? New Novel Exposes Perils of High School Addiction, Consequences Facing Misunderstood Teens BLOOMINGTON, Ind. Rabbits freeze when they are in danger. Students in denial mimic this behavior when faced with dangerous decisions. Facing the day-to-day tribulations of being a suburban teenager, one young woman begins self-medicating herself with weed and prescription drugs in Sandra K-Horn's The Rabbit Trap (published by AuthorHouse). Lexie Hamilton begins her freshman year at Marshall High School as a talented musician and honor level student. She is desperate to fit in and struggles to maintain a rigorous schedule of performances, academics and social gatherings. She begins to date a senior, but when she isn't ready for his sexual advances and ends the relationship, the people she thought were her friends begin to turn against her. Due to their own personal needs, Lexie's parents are unsupportive of her high school activities. Her dad is saddled with a back injury, and uses doses of Percocet and Xanax to cope with high demands of being the newest law professor at Ohio State University. Her mother spends the majority of her time engrossed in taking care of Lexie's younger sisters. Feeling unworthy of their love and support, Lexie is left to her own devices to deal with the high expectations placed upon her.
