

Something to Learn from Russia: Plus capitalist Development in South Africa & other writings, articles and speeches.

Dorothy Frances Montefiore was an English-Australian women's suffragist and socialist. She also wrote poetry, and her autobiography (also available here on Kindle). This volume collects her writings from the years 1909 - 1913 with the focus on Russia, South Africa and the situation in Europe, plus selected speeches and magazine articles. Quotes from the book: But still the lying capitalist press continued its fantastic stories until one day it became apparent that not only could Russia continue to do without us in her process of post-war reconstruction, but that we and the other Western nations of Europe could not do without her, and, as a result of that discovery, tentative efforts were made for trade communication between Russia and Great Britain with, as an ultimate outcome, Peace for Russia. --- The woman emigrant to South Africa Now we read of two servant girls, new arrivals in Cape Colony, who when the yoke of servitude galled left their situation abruptly, and were forthwith given into custody by their mistress, who charged them with desertion and detained their boxes. These girls were publicly marched through the streets as prisoners in custody, though the police refused to listen to the full demands of their exasperated employer to handcuff the prisoners. Domestic service is no doubt too often a drudgery in England, and it is high time that domestic helps should organise and stand for shorter hours and more human conditions; but employers over here are at least not haunted with the old bad traditions and prejudices of enforced black labour. ---The Belgian Socialist women fail apparently to grasp the situation of those women who stand for equal rights, political, economic, and social, for their own sex. At a recent meeting in Brussels they seem to have voted against equal pay for equal work, adding, we cannot admit the principle of women earning salaries equal to those of our brothers or our husbands. Let us, they continued, fight against the bourgeois but not against men. If these words have been correctly reported, the Belgian Socialist women have a long journey to travel along the evolutionary path before they are in touch with the aspirations and work of their fellow women in America and Europe. It cannot be too often repeated that government by might, without the conscious enlightened consent of the governed, is as demoralising for those who govern as it is for those who are governed. It is women's subservient position and want of education which at present stops the way of most of the great economic and social reforms with which European civilisation is travelling. Sex consciousness is just as necessary for the woman in the carrying out of these reforms as class-consciousness is for the workman in his struggle. It is not the capitalist who is being fought by the latter, but the system of capitalism. It is not Man who is being fought by the sex-conscious woman, but the principle which allows one evolved human being to keep another evolved human being in a state of permanent inferiority and incapacity.
