

Pirate Tales:The Escape Agents(Annotated)

I wasn't exactly new to war when Miss Collier had me come over to this side. I was raised on our frontier, Colonel, and out there a man can only quit Indian fighting when he ceases to sit up and breathe fresh air. Learning to steal one another's scalps, said the grizzled Captain Ricaud, is not exactly war as the Emperor teaches it. Well, drawled Colt, rubbing his blue-black chin, as the only man here who has sampled each brand, I say that both were originally baled out of the same keg. Now, General Dupont, that were under right now here in Spain, is allowed by all judges to have his uniform as Marshal of France cut and ready for him in Paris against when he comes back. Well, gentlemen, I assisted him and you to sack Cordova last week, and I brought along a nice jewelled mayors chain and that picture against the wall there, which you tell me is a Velasquez. I repeat my offer of the pair of black jennets for the portrait, said Paillard. Nope. I guess we got mules in the States already, but our future home, when I marry and we furnish one at Washington, could do with a Velasquez. I was going to tell you, though, that I was there when Ephraim Taylors men sacked the Mohawk villages at Striped Rock. Never heard of either him, them, or it, laughed Colonel Paillard. Colt thumped the table. There you have the whole case in a clamshell. Out of the Striped Rock fight I got a pack of beaver skins which turned out later to be full of moth. We have no titles chucked in out West. Here, for less work, I get named Major, and find the wherewithal to keep up my rank and style. As a Major in the French Service I'd step straight above Ephraim Taylors head, for instance, in one push at home. That is what Miss Collier predicted at No. 207 the night before I sailed from Boston harbour. But at this point the list of Major Colts ambitions was cut short. There was no preliminary noise from outside to show that the outpost of General Duponts army, of which they were officers, was being attacked. A bullet hummed in through the window, and, hitting the plaster on the further wall diagonally, ploughed a great streak along it, and as a finale, dived behind the Velasquez, and blew out the face of the portrait into a mere star of rags and paint. Colt, with the quickness of a conjurer, tipped his chair over and fell backwards on to the floor before the noise of the shot came to them, skillfully saving his long clay pipe from fracture. Grizzled old Ricaud sneered from the table. Pooh! he said, bullets dont kill, Major, though to beginners I believe they are startling. Now, at the Pyramids, where I had the honour to carry a musket -- Captain Ricaud broke off, and coincidental with his last
