Excerpt: ... >ur Majesty think fit, I would suggest that a holily be proclaimed, and that all your Majestys subcts be summoned to behold this wonderful curiosity, ew of them, I imagine, have seen a Gorgons head jfore, and perhaps never may again! 116. The king well knew that his subjects were an ile set of reprobates, and very fond of sight-seeing, i idle persons usually are. So he took the young ians advice, and sent out heralds and messengers, i all directions, to blow the trumpet at the street- ic irners, and in the market-places, and wherever two >ads met and summon everybody to court. Thither, jcordingly, came a great multitude of good-for-nothig vagabonds, all of whom, out of pure love of lischief, would have been glad if Perseus had met 15 ith some ill-hap in his encounter with the Gorgons. E there were any better people in the island (as I jally hope there may have been, although the story alls nothing about any such), they stayed quietly at ome, minding their own business, and taking care of 20 heir little children. Most of the inhabitants, at all vents, ran as fast as they could to the palace, and hoved, and pushed, and elbowed one another, in their agerness to get near a balcony, on which Perseus howed himself, holding the embroidered wallet in 25 lis hand. 117. On a platform, within full view of the baliony, sat the mighty King Polydectes, amid his evil :ounsellors, and with his flattering courtiers in a lemicircle round about him. Monarch, counsellors, 50 courtiers, and subjects, all gazed eagerly towan Perseus. 118. Show us the head! Show us the head! shouted the people; and there was a fierceness i 5 their cry as if they would tear Perseus to pieces, u: less he should satisfy them with what he had to sho^ Show us the head of Medusa
