

World Governments-United Nations-International Development Job Guide

The world government job book provides a good framework for all government websites in the world including the United Nations and a big list of international development, NGO and government organizations. For some country governments, I just list the national websites with a few government agencies but I also list city and state government websites for some of them too. Many national, state and local governments and international or world organizations (either development, governmental, nonprofit or for-profit) need skilled workers to do whatever projects they want to do so they look to hire people from anywhere to help get the job done. You either look through the job ads in any of the many world job websites or contact organizations, government agencies and companies cold with an email resume-cover letter saying you have a certain skill and youre looking for a job in that area. The way it works is that someone offer you a job, they do the paperwork in their country to get you a work permit which you get either in the mail, download or at the local embassy/consulate of that country then you go to that country with your passport and work permit and you're in to work. A book about world government websites and world organization website doesn't exist in the world as far as I know so I created it mostly by going to online databases and downloading country pages one-by-one and extracting the websites out of them so it's all here with easily the biggest website list of international government and development organization websites in the world all in one place. I list government websites for over 200 national governments including some as obscure as Mayotte or Pitcairn Island. Every little place has a government even the Vatican, Greenland and Christmas Island except for Antarctica. If you're interested in working for a foreign government, there are a lot of resources here including international development which is done a lot through International Government Organizations (IGOs) and don't forget the United Nations which employs people in every country not to mention its big organizations like the WHO (World Health Organization), UNESCO (UN Education, Science and Cultural Organization) and UNICEF (UN International Childrens Emergency Fund).

There's a chapter on world trade here. I cover the military and the tourist industry in other books. For most government information, look through your local phonebook in four separate government sections: Municipal. County. State. Federal. IGOs are international governmental organizations, organizations like the United Nations, NATO, WHO and others that were developed by a conglomeration of countries to serve a worldwide function that goes beyond the jurisdiction of just one country. The way international organizations work is that they usually hire people who live wherever their headquarters is located and send them overseas to do the job but this is not etched in stone. Your best bet is to look for international organizations located in your country, probably Canada or the U.S., get any job with them even if it means working in your home country for awhile then after you've proven yourself, ask for a foreign transfer. Many Canadian and American organizations that you might think are just limited to their home countries have involvements and offices overseas which is why you should investigate the organizations in your field to see if they operate in foreign countries. Contact them and ask if they have any job openings or ask what kind of credentials they want. If you belong to a trade/ professional organization, ask them if they have an international section or any leads for an international job. They can usually help you out. devdir.org, lists 50,000 organizations.
