

The First National Bank of Happenstance: A allegory on creation and evolution

Loss of Valuables Long ago in a galaxy far away? Wait this phrase has been taken. Okay then; Once upon a time? Not really, how about, In the beginning too long ago. This story begins of all places in a vault, a bank vault that is where people keep gold, silver or diamonds and money lots and lots of money. However these are not the only types of valuables people keep. For example, the standards of measurement of length and weight are kept in a vault somewhere, in France I believe, and every country has an official copy tucked away somewhere. Also, dangerous goods, such as fire arms and weapons are kept locked away. However there are still other types which are more important than these. There are valuables of thought such as books, and documents such as the Constitution. Furthermore there are valuables of ideas like the things we believe and hold as true. Some of these are more near and dear to us than any bag of gold. It is this type of theft, from the vault in the First National Bank of Happenstance that is the subject of this story. Yes it was from right there in that vault, in the middle of the night, that a long skinny hand reached into a safety deposit box and removed the towns most precious goods. Come and see if Happenstance gets away with his crime.
